How many of us can recall that childhood maternal command: “Wash your hands first” as we headed for the lunch or supper table? It is etched in our memories mostly because of our inventive ways to get dirty hands and how Mom was instilling us with the connection between cleanliness and food. For the most part, we Americans expect cleanliness in our public spaces, at least, as we indirectly accept the adage that “cleanliness is next to godliness.” Yes, we collectively believe in cleanliness.

Sadly, however, that belief gets lost when it comes to the dirt that soils our inner cleanliness. Many of us prefer to tolerate it. We let it linger inside us. We dislike anybody who challenges us to clean up our personal morality and behavior. But only a true friend would do so.

Stories of liars and cheats are almost routine items in the news. They spring from areas as diverse as government, banking, health care, the media, the military, universities and all the stages of schooling, marriage and even from within the Church herself.

All the talk and campaigns to clean up everything from our diets to our planet and everything in between stems from a conviction that something is not right. But the proof of Our Lord’s contention that the worst impurity comes from within a person is found in ourselves.

Following Christ offers an incomparable delight that follows from living the truth. We cannot just wash our hands of the present cultural comfort with lies. But we do our best to spread the word about the freedom the truth brings to life by living not just by the Ten Commandments but also by the Eight Beatitudes. And we do so with that unique confidence that comes from knowing Christ is with us all our days. Together we can get the whole world to “wash up.”
